The purpose of security can be understood as being the creation and maintenance of confidence. At its simplest, security involves protecting, guarding or defending something.

At its simplest, security involves protecting, guarding or defending something. This need to guard presupposes that the thing to be guarded has some value, whether in monetary or other terms. It also presupposes that there is some perceived threat to the thing guarded, whether that threat be immediate or potential.

But security doesn't concern itself with things alone. The word also has reference to freedom from doubt, anxiety or fear and since these are human attributes, security always has a personal context.

The efficient guarding or protecting of a thing will normally result in the peace of mind of the owner of that thing. Thus the purpose of security can be understood as being, not simply the protection of something but, and perhaps even more importantly, the creation and maintenance of confidence.

Security means being confident in expectations.
